WOMAN IN THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

Woman has made remarkable strides toward enfranchisement in the United States in the last four years; next Tuesday, if she shall avail herself of her full opportunity, she will be able to go to the polls 50,000 strong. Her vote, it is true, at the most will represent only a fraction of the total vote of the country, but it will be an influential factor in the States where it shall be cast. It is estimated that 15,515,000 men will vote for President and Vice President on November 5, or 15,135,000 in excess of the vote that can be possibly cast by women. This might be an important showing if it were a fact that the women would never get farther along than they are now in their fight for equal suffrage. The truth is, however, they are only at the very threshold of accomplishment. More important still it would be if it were a fact that women this year, or in any year of the future, will vote as a sex. They most assuredly will do nothing of the kind, and after the novelty of the situation wears off, those discussing political probabilities or possibilities will cease to do so with any regard to the sex of voters. Four years hence, it is reasonable to predict, the enfranchisement of women will have extended into many States where she must be practically a silent spectator next Tuesday. Notwithstanding the seeming setback to the suffrage cause in Ohio, the middle West generally is preparing to follow the Pacific West in granting to women equal political rights. Assuming that only those States now most forward in this movement shall grant woman suffrage before 1918, or in time for the election of that year, and assuming also the continuance of the present ratio of increase of the male vote, it seems probable that the total vote for the Presidency in November four years hence will approximate 25,000,000.

If all entitled to vote should cast their ballots this year, the total would run higher than this. According to the census figures, there are 3,369,151 males of all races and colors in the United States at the present time who are over twenty-one years of age. Deducting those un-entitled to the franchise, 23,000,000 males of voting age remain. Statistics demonstrate, however, that only 6 per cent of "potential voters" actually cast ballots. How to get the remaining 8 per cent to the polls is one of the hard problems of politics and government. What thinking people seem to expect of woman's influence in politics is that it shall lighten the lump. In relation to all social questions, particularly, this influence should be inspiring, stimulating and purifying. Woman under the franchise will be in a better position than ever before to enlist man's attention in behalf of measures that have concern for the family life of the nation and for the children who go out from the family to struggle with the world. There will be a better division of social accountability under woman suffrage than there is now, and through a fuller appreciation of his social obligations, man will naturally rise to a clearer understanding of his political responsibilities.
